Malnutrition and diseases

Malnutrition is a health condition in which the patient doesn't have enough of the four groups of nutrients – proteins, carbohydrates, lipids (fat) and vitamins. A person with malnutrition can develop some related diseases. These diseases occur for different reasons, the most important one being the lack of these nutrients in quality and quantity. The shortage of these nutrients in our body causes diseases related to malnutrition such as anaemia, kwashiorkor, blindness, etc.

There are many symptoms of malnutrition, but the most common that a person with malnutrition shows are: pale skin, weakness and swelling of the body. If you have a member of your family with these symptoms, you should persuade him/her to seek medical assistance as soon as possible.

Malnutrition and its related diseases can be cured but it depends on the stage of the disease. Malnutrition can be treated if patients change their eating habits – for example, eating a lot of fresh fruit and having a balanced diet. In hospitals, doctors prescribe antibiotics and vitamins, which help treat the disease. But the best way of recovering from malnutrition is to eat natural food, lots of vegetables and fruits!
